

As lawmakers ready to move quickly on bonding bill, report finds NM road deficiencies have high cost

More funding for road construction, repairs expected to be key issue during 30-day session

Dan Boyd
Journal Capitol Bureau

SANTA FE - The combination of rising inflation-related costs and less revenue due to more fuel-efficient vehicles has made it a bumpy ride for New Mexico drivers in recent years.

But state lawmakers are expected to take quick action during the 30-day legislative session that begins next week to pass a $1.5 billion bonding bill that could help alleviate a funding crunch for road repairs and construction statewide.

The bonding bill, which would have also increased vehicle registration fees and imposed a new fee on electric vehicles, stalled in the Senate during the final days of last year's 60-day legislative session. But a new version of the bill could advance to Gov. Michelle Lujan Grisham's desk for final approval in the first two weeks of this year's session, said Senate Majority Leader Peter Wirth, D-Santa Fe. "Given the fact that we've not raised the gas tax since (the 1990s), getting dollars into our roads is a huge, high priority," Wirth said in a recent interview.

He also said additional dollars for road projects will likely be allocated in a separate budget bill for the coming fiscal year that's also expected to be approved during the legislative session that starts Jan. 20.

The push for more road funding was bolstered Thursday by a report from a national group that found that driving on deficient roads costs New Mexico drivers about $3.3 billion per year. That figure was calculated based on the estimated costs of vehicle repairs from driving on rough roads, wasted fuel due to traffic congestion and car crashes.

In addition, the report specifically pegged the cost for drivers in Albuquerque at $3,061 per year, with slightly lower costs for drivers in Las Cruces and Santa Fe.

The report, released by TRIP, a Washington D.C.-based nonprofit group, also found that more than half of the roads in both Albuquerque and Las Cruces are currently in poor or mediocre condition. "Although the costs to drivers are already startlingly high and come at a time when many drivers can ill-afford it, they'll grow even higher in the future unless the state can provide additional funding to improve road and bridge conditions, ease congestion and enhance safety across the state," said Carolyn Bonifas Kelly, the director of communication and research for the group and an author of the report.

Meanwhile, the report also cited a current budget shortfall of $7.5 billion to pay for road projects determined to be necessary by the New Mexico Department of Transportation. Top DOT officials last year said the agency faced a $471.6 million gap in funding for priority projects around the state.

During a Thursday news conference, House Minority Leader Gail Armstrong, R-Magdalena, described road improvements as key to bolstering the state's economic development and public safety efforts.

At a glance:
 A report issued Thursday by a national group identified more than $7.5 billion in needed but unfunded transportation projects across New Mexico. Here are some of the proposed projects:

- $408 million — Add additional traffic lane on a 22-mile stretch of Interstate 25 between Bernalillo and Cochiti Pueblo.
- $500 million — Improve pavement along Interstate 40 from Santa Rosa to the Texas state line.
- $355 million — Rebuild U.S. Highway between Deming and Bayard to feature four lanes or an alternating passing lane.
- $48 million — Reconstruct and improve Cerrillos Road in Santa Fe between St. Francis Drive and St. Michael's Drive.
- $195 million — Widen U.S. Highway 64 between Taos and Tres Piedras to add shoulders.

"New Mexico is not a poor state," said Armstrong, who represents one of the state's largest legislative districts.

"And we shouldn't act like one when it comes to DOT."

While $65 million in state funds was allocated for road projects last year, critics said that amount of money was insufficient to keep up with necessary repairs statewide. A group of construction and maintenance workers urged Lujan Grisham to add road funding to the agenda of a special legislative session last fall, but the governor ultimately decided against doing so.

Given that backdrop, Sen. George Muñoz, D-Gallup, the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, pledged the $1.5 billion bonding bill will move quickly during this year's session to the governor's desk.

"New Mexico is going to step to the plate and make sure that's taken care of," Muñoz said Thursday.

However, he also called on the state Department of Transportation to be more efficient when it comes to putting appropriated state dollars to work.

New Mexico's state road fund gets its money from several revenue sources, including the gas tax,

Judge nixes top fed prosecutor's appointment

But leaves him in charge under a new job title

BY COLLEEN HENNING
 The Trump administration's effort to install a U.S. attorney for New Mexico without a U.S. Senate confirmation has failed, but a federal judge allowed Ryan Ellison to be a top prosecutor under another title.

of Justice appointees, two of whom have been controversial, who have lost their interest in acting U.S. attorney titles over the past year after federal courts invalidated their appointments as unlawful.

The Trump administration also in a contract unilateral to most citizens, lawyers and judges, wrote Senior U.S. District Judge David Ogden Chutkan in a 25-page ruling released Wednesday.

"The fundamental pillars of checks and balances among co-equal branches of the United States federal government are implicated." In late 2024, Ellison had gone from assistant U.S. attorney to interim U.S. attorney and then, "acting" U.S. attorney.

LEADING NEWS

FUGITIVE from Wyoming is accused of kidnapping child in Mexico. A3

LEADERSHIP pitch a law to regulate harmful AI. A3

SIX DEMOCRATIC senators warn of U.S. budget deficit. A3

HERE'S WHAT New Mexico needs to know for tax season. A3

BUSIFIED awaits court hearing next week to determine whether he will remain in custody while awaiting trial. A3

BUSINESS OUTLOOK Trade deal for U.S. and Taiwan sign a trade deal involving $200 billion in new investments in the U.S. technology. A3

ART OF INVESTING Stars N.E. Newcomb and Mark Babin discuss their craft before road work resumes at Trinity College. INSIDE

GHOST IN THE MACHINE "Anthropology" at Adobe Theater includes a play of the same name. INSIDE

SPORTS

COLLEGE BASKETBALL In-state basketball authority unveils report on recruiting. INSIDE

UNFOOTBALL is making its first move with the transfer window closing. INSIDE

PROF BASKETBALL is working to address a wave of suspensions. INSIDE

NATION & WORLD

AGGRESSIVE TACTICS used in Minnesota. INSIDE

INSIDE

CLASSIFIEDS A3

COMICS A3

ENTERTAINMENT A3

PELAGES A3

WEATHER A3

INSIDE

Report finds needed NM road projects have high cost

Publics along NM 25 in San Miguel County are shown in this recent photo. Additional funding for state roads could emerge as a key issue during the legislative session that begins next week.

More funding for road construction, repairs expected to be key issue during 30-day session

SANTA FE — The combination of rising inflation-related costs and less revenue than to more fuel-efficient vehicles has made it a bumpy ride for New Mexico drivers in recent years. But state lawmakers are expected to take quick action during the 30-day legislative session that begins next week to pass a $1.5 billion bonding bill that could help alleviate a funding crunch for road repairs and construction statewide.

The bonding bill, which would have also increased vehicle registration fees and imposed a new fee on electric vehicles, stalled in the Senate during the final days of last year's 60-day legislative session. But a new version of the bill could advance to Gov. Michelle Lujan Grisham's desk for final approval in the first two weeks of this year's session, said Senate Majority Leader Peter Wirth, D-Santa Fe.

"Given the fact that we've not raised the gas tax since (the 1990s), getting dollars into our roads is a huge, high priority," Wirth said in a recent interview.

He also said additional dollars for road projects will likely be allocated in a separate budget bill for the coming fiscal year that's also expected to be approved during the legislative session that starts Jan. 20.

The push for more road funding was bolstered Thursday by a report from a national group that found that driving on deficient roads costs New Mexico drivers about $3.3 billion per year. That figure was calculated based on the estimated costs of vehicle repairs from driving on rough roads, wasted fuel due to traffic congestion and car crashes.

In addition, the report specifically pegged the cost for drivers in Albuquerque at $3,061 per year, with slightly lower costs for drivers in Las Cruces and Santa Fe.

The report, released by TRIP, a Washington D.C.-based nonprofit group, also found that more than half of the roads in both Albuquerque and Las Cruces are currently in poor or mediocre condition.

"Although the costs to drivers are already startlingly high and come at a time when many drivers can ill-afford it, they'll grow even higher in the future unless the state can provide additional funding to improve road and bridge conditions, ease congestion and enhance safety across the state," said Carolyn Bonifas Kelly, the director of communication and research for the group and an author of the report.

Meanwhile, the report also cited a current budget shortfall of $7.5 billion to pay for road projects determined to be necessary by the New Mexico Department of Transportation. Top DOT officials last year said the agency faced a $471.6 million gap in funding for priority projects around the state.

During a Thursday news conference, House Minority Leader Gail Armstrong, R-Magdalena, described road improvements as key to bolstering the state's economic development and public safety efforts.

At a glance:
 A report issued Thursday by a national group identified more than $7.5 billion in needed but unfunded transportation projects across New Mexico. Here are some of the proposed projects:

- $408 million — Add additional traffic lane on a 22-mile stretch of Interstate 25 between Bernalillo and Cochiti Pueblo.
- $500 million — Improve pavement along Interstate 40 from Santa Rosa to the Texas state line.
- $355 million — Rebuild U.S. Highway between Deming and Bayard to feature four lanes or an alternating passing lane.
- $48 million — Reconstruct and improve Cerrillos Road in Santa Fe between St. Francis Drive and St. Michael's Drive.
- $195 million — Widen U.S. Highway 64 between Taos and Tres Piedras to add shoulders.

Sweatshirtgate: The end or just the beginning?

City ethics board sleep complaint involving 'I Love Tim Keller' hoodies, considers

BY COLLEEN HENNING
 Just days before the election, the sight of dozens of bright yellow "I Love Tim Keller" hoodies in the hands of people along East Central made local lines, three public outcry and approved a 10-day "I Love Tim Keller" investigation.

Now, the city of Albuquerque's Board of Ethics is considering formally investigating the matter despite a complete ban on a local politics blue-ribbon coalition to know who distributed the hoodies and why.

In December, Paul Gering, the president of the Blue Ribbon Coalition, lines, three public outcry and approved a 10-day "I Love Tim Keller" investigation.

Now, the city of Albuquerque's Board of Ethics is considering formally investigating the matter despite a complete ban on a local politics blue-ribbon coalition to know who distributed the hoodies and why.

In December, Paul Gering, the president of the Blue Ribbon Coalition, lines, three public outcry and approved a 10-day "I Love Tim Keller" investigation.

Now, the city of Albuquerque's Board of Ethics is considering formally investigating the matter despite a complete ban on a local politics blue-ribbon coalition to know who distributed the hoodies and why.

In December, Paul Gering, the president of the Blue Ribbon Coalition, lines, three public outcry and approved a 10-day "I Love Tim Keller" investigation.

Now, the city of Albuquerque's Board of Ethics is considering formally investigating the matter despite a complete ban on a local politics blue-ribbon coalition to know who distributed the hoodies and why.

lines, three public outcry and approved a 10-day "I Love Tim Keller" investigation.

Now, the city of Albuquerque's Board of Ethics is considering formally investigating the matter despite a complete ban on a local politics blue-ribbon coalition to know who distributed the hoodies and why.

In December, Paul Gering, the president of the Blue Ribbon Coalition, lines, three public outcry and approved a 10-day "I Love Tim Keller" investigation.

Now, the city of Albuquerque's Board of Ethics is considering formally investigating the matter despite a complete ban on a local politics blue-ribbon coalition to know who distributed the hoodies and why.

In December, Paul Gering, the president of the Blue Ribbon Coalition, lines, three public outcry and approved a 10-day "I Love Tim Keller" investigation.

Now, the city of Albuquerque's Board of Ethics is considering formally investigating the matter despite a complete ban on a local politics blue-ribbon coalition to know who distributed the hoodies and why.

In December, Paul Gering, the president of the Blue Ribbon Coalition, lines, three public outcry and approved a 10-day "I Love Tim Keller" investigation.

Now, the city of Albuquerque's Board of Ethics is considering formally investigating the matter despite a complete ban on a local politics blue-ribbon coalition to know who distributed the hoodies and why.

In December, Paul Gering, the president of the Blue Ribbon Coalition,