OKLAHOMA CITY (KFOR) – Safe actions save lives is the calling card for the state department of transportation's work zone awareness month initiative. Warmer weather brings more travel and more construction, so they're urging drivers to keep their eyes up and avoid distractions.

Among the reliable signs that spring has sprung are construction zones sprouting up everywhere. April's work zone awareness month is a good reminder to refocus on the road.

"We really want to make sure people are not being distracted while they're driving, buckling up, slowing down, and making sure they're aware of what's going on," Oklahoma Department of Transportation's Public Information Manager Emily Long said.

They're expecting about 130 areas of construction statewide, and that's not including maintenance.

"That could be potholes, repairs, guardrail, repairs, striping, things like that," Long said.

According to Long, 74 ODOT and OTA workers have lost their lives while improving our roads. Hundreds of crashes also happen in work sites each year, mostly due to distracted driving and speeding.

"The amount of motorists that are actually killed within work zones is just astronomical," Long said.

A recent study from a national transportation research nonprofit shows Oklahoma's fatality rate on the road overall is 19% higher than the national average. That makes a $17 billion impact on the state each year.

"These are people who deserve to get home safely back to their families in their lives," she said.

Gov. Kevin Stitt issued a declaration declaring Apr. 20-24 Work Zone Awareness Week. Long said the department's initiative mirrors a nationwide push on the same topic. Below, you can find some of the upcoming public address announcements in the coming weeks.
